Hares: Gorgeous, Lucky Lek, Fungus & Sam Song

Run 1771 kicked off from one of Phuket's best laager spots, overlooking the sapphire goodness of the east coast. This view is one to treasure with its bay below, massive sky above and refreshing breeze blowing.

Fungus, Gorgeous and Lucky Lek hared for the day, and a good job they did. The run took the pack spiraling up through the tropical lushness with a nice combination of incline and flat. At least three times during the run I had to stop and gather my thoughts as a looked out from Cape Panwa's highest points at the spectacular seascapes. It's at moments like this we all know why we live on this island, so hats off to the hares for carving this run out of the jungle.

As the front running pack reached about 1km from the finish, they were all smiles and laughs. The run had been frenetic, yet fun. Talk of cold beers could be heard as most felt the proximity of the circle within their reach. It was then things went left-field. We found ourselves on a check void of any paper. After much checking and cursing, one half of the group went with the road and the other down a narrow path. Armed with a trusty GPS, we edged our way past baying hounds and miraculously, linked up with paper again. I've no idea how this happened. Let's just put it down to some funky Jungian synchronicity, or maybe the stars were positioned in just the right spots. This good fortune allowed Butt Plug and me to amble into the circle after a heart-thumping one hour and four minutes.

As the sun set in the west, our eastern vantage point luxuriated in orange, scarlet and gold. Night began to invade the evening while the hares received a resounding good run from the swaying masses. Good run indeed.

(This is a bit sparse on detail because I've been running about like a loon getting baby shit in time for the real baby shit coming later this week... And the fact that I'm scribing due to loosing a coin toss with Fungus!!)
